THE ATHLETIC TYPE

"FELLOWS," Tommy Hawkins announced, "there's no doubt about it. The time has come for every one of us to aid his fellow man."

A murmur of agreement swept through the Hillsdale High School boys gathered for a council of war in Tommy's basement playroom.

Tommy pounded the table in front of him with his fist. "If we don't do something about 'Muscles' Malcolm soon," he declared emphatically, "he'll have that moniker forever—and we'll forever be out in the cold as far as the fairer sex is concerned."

Another annoyed mutter of agreement, and Tommy continued, "Now you all know what the situation is. Malcolm, to put it mildly, is an outdoor boy. So far he's been able to outlast all of us in every brand of competition we've tried, and as a result, our girl friends are beginning to think we're all weaklings."

Each boy flushed a little.

"Now," Tommy concluded, "several of us called this meeting tonight because it's almost time to plan the class picnic, and there's an ugly rumor going around that Malcolm is agitating to make it a day of athletic contests, all of which Malcolm will be able to win. We've got to think of a way to keep him from pushing his plan through—or else we'll all look like a bunch of drips to our girls—that is, if we have any girls left after the picnic day," he sighed mournfully. "Any suggestions?"

The group was silent for a few minutes. Then one fellow piped up from the back row. "How can we do anything?" he groaned. "If the girls find out we're trying to stop Malcolm, they'll think we're a bunch of cowards anyhow."

Suddenly Jerry Jackson jumped to his feet. "I've got it!" he shouted, his face wreathed in smiles. "Why didn't I think of it before?"

"Tell us!" the others cried at once. Jerry calmed himself long enough to describe his plan to the gathering, and when he'd finished, they all agreed unanimously that it was a perfect scheme. The details were worked out, and the meeting adjourned.

Two days later a pretty petite redhead arrived in town. Approximately three hours after she got off the train and was getting settled in her new home, Jerry called on her.

"Gwen," he exclaimed when she opened the door for him, "am I glad to see you!"

"Well," Gwen said, "it isn't often a girl gets such a friendly welcome from her own cousin. Would I be too suspicious if I asked you whether you had something on your mind?" She grinned at him.

"You know me too well, woman," Jerry grinned back. "We've got a problem here, and if you'll help us solve it, you'll be the sweetheart of the Hillsdale boys forevermore."

"That's quite a reward," Gwen exclaimed. "Just what is your problem? And what makes you think I'm the master-mind to help you?"

Jerry explained about "Muscles" Malcolm. "You've just come into town," he finished, "so neither Malcolm nor the girls will ever suspect anything, and I promised the boys I'd ask you." He looked at her pleadingly. "Would you?" he asked.

Gwen thought a minute. "What have I got to lose?" she answered. "Nothing like making a name for yourself your first week in town!"

The next day the boys saw to it that Gwen wandered into the gym after school while Malcolm was running around the track. Well, Gwen thought, pleased, this should be an enjoyable task. Malcolm was good looking, there was no doubt about it, and his constantly keeping in shape hadn't hurt him any.

She pretended to look a little puzzled, as if she'd somehow gotten into the wrong room. Malcolm stopped running and walked over to her.

"Could I help you?" he asked, flashing a smile that exposed his even white teeth.

"I was hunting for the cooking room," Gloria said helplessly, "and I seem to have lost my way." She smiled at Malcolm. "I just arrived at Hillsdale today," she added

"Well," Malcolm said masterfully, "if you'd like to wait a few minutes till I can change, I'll show you where the cooking room is — and perhaps I can walk you home."

"Oh, that would be awfully nice of you," Gwen said.

Malcolm ran to the locker room, and in a few minutes he was guiding Gwen through the streets of the town. They had a lot of things in common, they'd discovered by the time they reached Gwen's house. Both of them liked to hike and bowl and play tennis and golf and any number of other sports. Before Malcolm left, he'd made a date with Gwen for tennis the next afternoon.

As soon as she got in her house, Gwen phoned Jerry to tell him that it had worked, that she and Malcolm were to play tennis the next day. And the next day Gwen defeated Malcolm decisively in successive tennis sets. Malcolm looked a bit strange, but he took his defeat well, and by the time he deposited Gwen at her door, he'd bounced back enough to ask her for a bowling date the following-day.

The bowling contest, also, ended in several overpowering victories for Gwen. Malcolm looked definitely strange, a trifle flushed and somewhat worried. This was obviously something new for him.

During the weekends that followed Gwen beat Malcolm at golf; she outlasted him in energy on an all-day hiking trip, always in the past Malcolm's special strong point; she was still swimming enthusiastically in the lake when Malcolm had already settled down for a quiet sun bath on the raft.

After each victory Gwen phoned Jerry to tell him what she knew he thought was good news, but each time she felt a little more doubtful about what she was doing. Malcolm had been a good sport about it, she realized, but even so no fellow liked to have a girl beat him at everything he'd always prided himself in. The end of Malcolm's and her fun, she felt, would be coming soon, and, she realized with a start, she didn't want it to end.

But the boys won their own prize. All the planning meetings for the class picnic had taken place, and Malcolm hadn't said a word about wanting to make it an athletic endurance contest. Each boy had a special warm spot in his heart for Gwen, but Gwen had developed a special warm spot in her heart for Malcolm.

The day before the picnic Gwen was completely downhearted. Malcolm hadn't said a word about taking her, and of course, she'd been so busy competing with him in everything, that she hadn't had time to meet any other boys.

That afternoon she waited for him near the school's main entrance. He spotted her the instant he came out, looking rather worried.

"Gwen," he began, "I've been trying to find you all day. I'd hoped . . ."

"Wait," Gwen interrupted him. She didn't want to give him the chance of saying he hoped she hadn't planned on going to the picnic with him. Quickly she blurted out her whole story, of how Jerry and the boys had put her up to defeating him at everything to keep his picnic plan quiet because she was Jerry's cousin and new in town; and she also told him how for the last five years she'd won the athletic award in her hometown and how she was ashamed of herself now.

Malcolm's eyes opened wide. "You won the athletic award for five years?" he asked. Gwen nodded miserably.

"Why, that's wonderful!" Malcolm exclaimed.

It was Gwen's turn to be astonished. "But . . . but, Malcolm," she sputtered, "I thought you'd be angry. I didn't think boys liked to be beaten at their own specialties."

Malcolm grinned. "And here I've been thinking that you must think I'm a horrible example of the male species," he said wryly.

"Oh, no," Gwen burst out, then blushed. "Then it wasn't because I won all the time that you didn't try to make the picnic an athletic day?"

"No," Malcolm said firmly. "It was because you're fun to be with and I wanted to spend all the time with you instead of in some contest or other." He looked worriedly at Gwen again. "What I began to say before was, I'd hoped you've been planning on going to the picnic with me. I'd sort of taken it for granted."

Gwen nodded again, happily this time. She'd been so dumb. Malcolm had expected to take her to the picnic all along.

"What's important to me," Malcolm continued softly, "is winning you!"
